It also features Latin, Greek, Russian, and Latin to English dictionaries. A module for English to English is also included. The program offers two major interfaces: the main interface and the Dictionary Viewer. The main interface is where most of the core functions take place. The first interface is where users can enter data or conduct research. There are three tabs in the main interface: • Dictionary: This tab contains all of the dictionaries the program has access to. The user can choose which one they want to use. • Search: This tab is where the user enters a word or phrase. The program displays all the entries it can find. • Examples: This tab displays several example sentences that are either provided by the program or from online sources. The user can view the sentences at different reading levels. The second interface allows the user to see what the program has found. There are four panes in the viewer, each one containing an individual dictionary. The Dictionary pane is where the user can see all the dictionaries the program has access to. Each dictionary contains the words in alphabetical order, followed by a list of all the variants of each word. The Search pane is where the user can search the program's dictionaries. The program's search engine returns search results as one of the following: • A list of related words • A list of synonyms • A list of words that contain the searched-for words.
